Do Liquid Crystal Displays (LCD's) actually contain liquid? No, at least not the kind of liquid you're thinking of. The term "Liquid" in LCD refers to the quality of the crystal. Most LCD televisions and computer monitors use twisted nematic liquid crystal, which means that the crystal's structure is naturally twisted in such a way as to react differently with different electrical currents. Basically, it "untwists" to various degrees depending on the type of current it encounters. Because the crystals are changeable (or fluid) they're referred to as "Liquid"
